Dear Partners and Friends,

For the looney left, being offended is a full-time job. (They actually offer full majors in this stuff.) At Grand Valley State, a certain group finds it offensive to say that your gender is determined at conception. Read how CBR's John Dillinger (not his real name) ran afoul of the law at a recent GAP. Biology professors, beware!

Also this month, we continue our coverage of our most recent record-setting GAP tour, featuring our first GAP ever at East Carolina University.

Shiver me timbers! Hornswagging pro-aborts no match for GAP at East Carolina University (ECU)

It was our first time ever to visit the pirates of East Carolina University (ECU). Free speech policies at ECU allow outside speakers to reserves space, so we did. We met many pro-life students and are now organizing an Advocates for Life student organization.

Though our location was a good one (outside the Student Center), ECU is a huge campus and there is no one collection point for all of the pedestrian traffic. With our truth truck, we reached many thousands of students who may not have seen GAP in person.

Made them look. A female student said it best, "I didn't want to look but I had to look." She was pro-life but had never seen the evil on display.

I have just changed my mind! Another student started by saying abortion might be a viable choice for other women, "They are little human beings; I wouldn't do it, but..." A few minutes later, after seeing how slavery was a "choice" in the 1800's, she exclaimed, "Well, when you put it like that, I have just changed my mind! I understand what you are saying."

Fugitive John Dillinger (real identity hidden) commits a "bias" crime by suggesting that gender is determined at conception. (We couldn't possibly make this stuff up.)

Police enforce science denial at Grand Valley State University

CBR volunteer John Dillinger (not his real name) pointed to the GAP signs. "What about their rights?" he asked. "These women didn't get to choose." (Several signs feature preborn females.)

He was addressing a Grand Valley State University (GVSU) female, posing as a male, who said that abortion was a woman's choice.

"Gender is determined way after that," she retorted.

Woah!!! Her real hot button wasn't abortion; it was gender assignment. She was offended Dillinger would even suggest a preborn child is a female. After all, a pre-born can't yet decide whether he/she is a boy or a girl.

We can't make this stuff up.

"No, gender is determined at conception," Dillinger replied. We often have to give lectures on basic human biology, so he thought nothing more about it.

Little did he know.

Half an hour later, two police officers strode up. It seems Mr. Dillinger was wanted for questioning. At Changed minds at East Carolina U ...

I had no idea. A male student expressed the sentiments of most college students, "I had no idea this is what abortion was. They are so tiny, and that is a hand!"

He was a microcosm of Americans in general. The vast majority have never seen and do not want to see the gruesome reality of abortion. We must confront that ignorance with real abortion pictures.

The need to see. Another student said "It's gruesome. I didn't know how developed it is so early." She went on to say, "People do need to see this; maybe they will make different decisions."

Opened my eyes. A communications major was quoted in the school paper, "It (GAP) opened my eyes to the situation; it gave viewers a different way to see it. The pictures were graphic but sometimes it may take that to get a point across, especially for something as big as life." Common sense from a college student!

The smoking gun. Do you see a common thread? Disturbing photos of abortion victims pierce through the lies and deception to inform common sense and conscience.

Victim images have been the smoking gun for every successful social reform movement in our history. We must continue to put them in front of Americans, over and over and over again.

Dillinger questioned at GVSU ...

GVSU, if you say gender is determined at conception, they call the law, because you have just offended — are you ready for this — transexuals.

We can't make this stuff up.

The officers informed Dillinger that a "bias" report had been filed. This can happen anytime anyone says anything that upsets anybody. When a student offends anybody, a bias report can be placed in his permanent record and could potentially vandalize his future career. Bias reports are weapons to punish nonconformist views. Or, in this case, the statement of a scientific fact.

Only by denying medical science can you escape prosecution for this thought crime. Makes us wonder how many biology professors are rotting away in the GVSU gulag. Not too sure about that. Anyway, ...

Dillinger avoided incriminating himself further and was able to leave campus without further ado. (He is still required to report his whereabouts daily to his wife, but that's something else and we don't want to get into that.)

Dillinger got away, but what about the students who can't escape?

Below: The East Carolinian (student paper) places abortion victim photos on the front page, above the fold. We love it when a plan comes together!

Center for Bio-ethics in the Mendenhall Center for Bio-ethical Advocacy project director Jackie Hawkins, above right, explains the placement of these intense images to an intrigued student. The project is to draw attention to the opposition of abortion.
